National News from the Telegraph Lines
Tidbits of
News Stories from the Albuquerque, New Mexico, Daily Citizen
1892, 1893, 1894, 1895, 1896

As I read the Albuquerque, New Mexico, Daily Citizen I found that in about 1890 with the coming of the railroad and the erection of telegraph lines accompanying the building of the lines to the west, that a lot of national and international news was being sent over these lines. I could see that there were more and more of the national news items being picked up by the local papers regarding disasters, storms, and the deaths occurring around the United States. For Example, for several days there were reports and listings of fatalities occurring in the St. Louis tornado in 1896, with several hundred names listed. I felt that possibly this could be a new source of information for the researcher; thus, this compilation.

I attempted to limit the compilation to deaths and extremely interesting items, but concentrating on the death aspect. I edited the articles to the pertinent information to try and identify the person or persons involved. The researcher may then go to the source newspaper, the Albuquerque, New Mexico, Daily Citizen, to get the full story, and that may lead to news stories in other cities.

This compilation was made with the hope that possibly the mention in the Albuquerque, New Mexico, Daily Citizen, (also called the Evening Citizen for a brief period of time), the afternoon daily paper, of some disaster or death occurring around the country might help the researcher to find a source document. With so few death certificates and obituaries being filed of record, this might help someone locate a missing or elusive ancestor. If you find something here, then we can supply the newspaper article. A series of periods indicates omission of some part of the article.
